Supplementary Analysis

On 2025-10-12 in the evening, an Anomaly manifested in the Hockley district of Nottingham, centred around the marital proceedings between one Ava Lynn and one Vera Winters. The Anomaly took the form of a spider atop a playing vinyl record of the 1969 performance of the James Bond theme 'All the Time in the World' by Louis Armstrong^{a,b}, while the newly-wedded wives reminisced fondly on the events of the day. The Anomaly had an aesthetic of Record, Spider, Web-reel, and Golden Sunlight, in loose order of precedence - it was fixated on the happiness of the couple, and used its time-affecting abilities to 'Replay' the events of the day in a fixed area. Web and telecommunications reaching outside the area were all echoed back to occur on Sunday.

Resultingly, the area of Hockley became a looping parabolic time-sink: the Anomaly causing the events of the day to repeat, restoring matter, weather and actions of actors to their original behaviours as of the day of the wedding, with any new instances of matter or actors being snared in the recursive events of the loop. Efforts to leave the area resulted in the perception of time stalling to an effective pause for any individuals - preventing egress from the area of effect.

The result of this was a cumulative entrapment of any and all who moved through this area from between the days of Sunday and Thursday. Seemingly, actors who were paused were used as reserve energy stores for perpetuating the loop - based on the experiences of Agents feeling exhaustion upon being reintegrated to their second loop-iteration. Entering on the Wednesday and experiencing a full loop to acclimate, Field Team 3 was able to contain the Anomaly after appeasing it on the Thursday loop through assisting the wedding proceedings and then confusing it by drawing attention to the fact its actions actively run against the couple (and the publics) future happiness. The behaviour of the loop to back-channel telecommunications to the prior Sunday was used in conjunction with Agent's workline requisitions and Asking The Agency to produce a cover story of a wide-spread release of a new psychotropic street drug known as 'Penguin Dust' due to a vehicle collision. Blame was cast on certain businesses in the area, and articles speaking of the variable issues with the perception of time, reverie and retroactive delusions (hallucinations in one's memory as opposed to in the present, the generation of false memories and beliefs in hindsight) were circulated.

^a - This was likely the 1994 UK re-release due to the relative obscurity of the piece at the time, and the cultural affinity for the song in the UK - being the 3rd most popular song at weddings - due to it becoming popular in this market 25 years after the fact due to its usage in a Guinness commercial).

^b - Potential relevance to R&D - the original performance is ironic on two fronts: firstly, in the fiction, it is the last words of the narrative said by Bond in relation to the death of his wife. Secondly, Louis Armstrong's health was failing quite significantly during recording and he required the assistance of another musician in the recording booth - he was selected for the purposes of delivering the line with a sense of irony.

Subject - The Sunday Wedding of Vera and Nadia.

Sentiment - Nostalgic Reverie (North + South - joy and slightly-sad reminiscence of a happy day now past).

Symptom - To lose oneself in remembrance and looking to the past, that one loses track of the present and future

Approximised Focus: "Nostalgic Remembrance of a Happy Day"
